Box Number

My last few weeks have quietly been taken by a rising tension, shielding me from relaxation, stealing sleep from weekend days.

A lover lost, which seems to feed my insecure apprehension.
A new job, where, to settle in some is beyond my working haze.

I'm 28, a bloke whose seen less of loving's dreamt attention than belongs to male pretension.
I need to catch a woman's gaze.

“Smoke Filled Rooms”

Fall-out chains across the agenda, issues mist the verbal blur, weapons wait tense on lips, lungs filled with poisoned air.

Stab!

Oh, so good the first time, such nerves, such achievement, but now, again, again,
for what?

Five Days

But it's a pity I couldn't say goodbye the way I'd like to,
to give you another fondness to recall me by.

I remember the day that I caught your eye:
I don't really know what it was you saw, but to have been in that smile.

And it's good the weeks apart weren't simply thrown away:
that we had time to say hello as lovers like to do.

But it couldn't really work;
you saw that then,
and now I see it too.
But there'll always be affection, and the smile in your eye.

Inmos

I am to write an ABAQ book, passing on to programmers Atari wrapped Transputer gifts, and HELIOS Assemblers.

The book of opcodes given me lists some numbers with no meanings.
A evening birdsong has more logic, a juggernaut could better code, even Spock, with forever in a hell Gödel free, could not program happily.

I've left my cat in San Francisco with John and his sister Miss Doe so when I went to clean the chair
I had to stop 'cos Sid weren't there.

And your confusion at that verse (if your mind's in reason's hearse) resembles mine when I see blurb about your chip: a useful word for each opcode would be nice:
you can't roast nuts without some rice.

Can you help? Do you care?
Why do you just sit and stare?

Yours in anticipation of some notes of explanation...

*Inmos kindly sent me the opcode book I wanted.
I never wrote the ABAQ book.*

Plumstead Station By Electric Light

Plumstead Station by electric light shows the joy of Thatcher's night.
Snow encroaches the lonely ex-worker whose hell is dismissed as "that of a shirker; if one quarter are too poor to hope who cares: we'll get three quarters' vote."

Is It Coffee In The Blood

I don't understand what the hell's going on, the pressure boils over and makes verbal song.
Something has struck at the side of my mind.
Now I know why a poet is found distracting this pressure with basic desire rebuilding the dam using sexual power.

Tonight I could break, tonight I could die, tonight is the night I ask myself why.

What is this need that impels me to write what is this need I find I must fight?
Why must I wander, why verbally roam, why must I wander, wander alone?

But It's For The Children...

Imagine your new, squalling baby, the hopes, the heart, the love, the clasping hands, the rare unspoken night, the early smile, the throwing up, taking her round the house to welcome her to her home.

Imagine waking one morning to discover your child a hollow, plastic shell, a light, cold, unmoving, hard and nasty toy, with cracked, faded red cheeks, and a price tag on her foot.

Welcome to Christmas.

M6

Imagine lying down on a beach, watching large, smooth waves come to shore, and childish wind playing with the surf; now stop the action, hold the valleys still,
turn the waves into flowing hills, change the day into early evening, and sink the sun to those foothills on the left so the red shines through the water so the spray is an evening mist so you see the mountain picture dusk teased me with just now.

Angst Cycle

The Door

A door was never really opened just enough to trap my heart.

Watching wind blow rain around, white foam build shapes of Henry Moore, green trees hide sky from eyes below, humid sleep and light too bright.

Grey wind blow rain around.

Father

A lively young man in old photographs admiring the gifted coffee-pot lamp, pretending to smoke, a pretend celebration;
you inhabit so much family memory.

You stood my six-year-old self snub to the wall
when I held my privacy, instinctively, silent of my school day.

Just as I would now, you ran my locomotives
as I, unable to brash my toys, sulked beneath the table.

I remember peeking through the crack of a half-closed door,
looking down the hall,
when mother came back, crying.

Father,
you send advice through third hand tales, you star in fondly corrupted anecdotes.

I still hear their shock watered down the years.

Father,
why did you die?

Why Is England So Full Of Fools

A year of dreaming:
burst.
A year of hope.

A bubble of sweet wishes like the last bubble blown:
it seemed to last forever.
As the other glitter reflecting dead dreams died around dissolving,
one survived.

But all the looking,
all the wishing,
all the hope,
a drop of hurt,
splattered on the floor.

Hell welcomes me again another trip round the tourist sights:
the wishes of "What If", the fire of "What Should Have Been".

Formulas belong in the dying dreams of science, in newly filmed repeats in the television desert.

I said nothing,
like another rusty machine, another rational logic gate, another dry processor
in the statistic age.

Yet your look was “Yes”
and my dreams were you.
I waited for you to say what I saw, you waited for me to come anyway, and the bubble died.

Why is England so full of fools?

(untitled)

Showers. Red eyes, “mummy, why did daddy die?”.
Years later, I still ask.

Letter

A long time ago when the trees were learning to be green again you wrote from a languid, slow summer saying you would be in England's grey cold so soon from now. Unless Australia's next season of sun, its summer Christmas, holds you more than legal bindings, or that old address is not the place to write, or the unions repair their broken threat, Hi!

Rose

You ought to know
there is some snow
settled on your nose.

But what is odd,
you silly sod,
from it there grows a rose.

In Another Conversation

A gallic duchess, with white light streaming like happy tears through gingerbread hair.

A grinning nose, and cosmetic skin smooth as the dead of night.

Smiles given more often than trains can take each and every one of us home to love.

Moon–Shadowed Walk

The glow of the summer's day declines into warmth.

The wind brushes each caress of our conversation.

You have sweetened my secret doubts away.

Debugging

Masonry.
Dust rising from System mountains, Collapsed.

My logic is dead:
I thought the world was stable.

I hunt the crash,
with algorythmic oil to smooth the modules to keep my world intact.

I hunt in functions running down statements, through calls, chasing echoes of errors always in the next procedure.

Sometimes I trip a pointer, and the system rebuilds itself.
Sometimes I put each assignment back, one by one
to find some element gone;
but no tool reports a fault:
the program stays down.

It should feel so good,
when I win the world again;
victory
should satisfy.
But it never does.

These quakes should never happen.

Laughter Rose Above My Tired Desire

As I heard the two-tone voice of Jo my libido's invention, sitting naked in the empty seat beside me, vanished,

as laughter rose above my tired desire.

Cavity Wall Insulation

Foam,
bricked in,
night shaded.
Fumes

drifting
through cracks,
a silent strychnine
gas, tightening
the lungs,

blocking air
like a child lock blocks escape from the back seat,

waiting for sleep's appearance before launching the final breathless attack.
