bathroom spider

there’s no one in the bathroom but you you’re using the mirror you can’t turn round
you have to finish

there’s no one in the mirror but you the glass fogs
you can’t turn round

there’s no one’s in the steam but you you’re nearly …
your uncovered neck is touched

it is terrified Elsewhen

It’s wrong, right, what youngers do, daynight.

But, when I was then, I did so too.

Right it was, then, that when.

Stupid, now, I was.

Elastic stretches less the more it’s overused.
Hence The Coldness

It’s nice to know you don’t consider me as worth the grief of clicking on ‘reply’
and typing
N
then O.
Fear In Flight, God
a poem in two forms

I.

While driving home, this winter night, I saw the orange greenhouse light illuminate the sky.

The telly says, in Pakistan, a hijacked plane, the bastards gone, they killed a two–day groom.

An airport near, another crash, a cargo plane, the pilot’s dash– ing self–belief, now dead.

A glass of wine, the need for sleep, this cyclic time, disturbed relief, so naturally I dream...
2.

I’m drinking Rosé, the colour of inhuman blood, watching.

From night–time winter nurseries cylinders of bright orange light rise to the lowering cloud, and spread like petals, dying.

Hijackers
murder a bridegroom for sight.

Elsewhere,
the heat is so extreme that shocked birds flying far above flames ignite,
falling as shells, incrementing death.

They think to reduce their nation’s pain by adding to it.

This is a time of cyclic myth of winter solstice, of Y2K,
of Christian birth.

Today’s God consumes.
Thoughts On Odes To Nightingales

So what is this nightingale of which the old poets sing?

I drive to country dykes, to dust, and hear a throat of motorway.

I climb a Munro hill, by rail, and hear the tourist café chat.

I dive the barrier reef’s remains and hear an abstract diesel chant.

Those poets,
they blaze their praise of this bird I’ve not heard.

I think, you know, the nightingale’s an allergy to dance, or punk, or what the poet hates, the one that he or she desires, appreciates.

So next you find an ode to a nightingale’s airy delight, make your thoughts Sir Oswald Osbourne biting the head off a chicken that night. the three monks

the only mountains in England apart from those hills in the north called mountains by fixing the rules are the three monks tall the way children see gods shadow on all the flat Cambridgeshire the remains of some prehistoric volcano tan brown rock absorbing sun shining on vertical up and fractal bare to the very top where each peak rounds inward a colony of hard green pine the fringe on the heads of the pious these three stalwarts surround the fussy little town of Tull on the March to Sleaford road flat and straight across the fens up and down and winding round flat and fenland straight again and why do you not know these monks natural cathedrals of geology dominating the tower of God–love Ely military deceit maps the monks as meres see the mars of shocked German bombers and that pair of nuclear B–52s there’s talk of some visual disguise you’ll glance to see unfocused air only wise eyes will comprehend Neil Armstrong Is My Explorer Of The Millennium

He did much more than simply explore someone else’s home.

His shoulders stand so we might land on some dusty lunar shore.
Tobacco’s Such A Treat

If barons never bribe, authorities are pure,
then why deny research, why ban the brightest cure?

Chorus:
Tobacco’s such a treat
and dope is danger grass,
so says the law’s conceit:
for parliament’s an arse!

Some victims die of drugs too strong, or full of crap; when licensing applies inspectors slap that rap.

Chorus:
Tobacco’s such a treat
and dope is danger grass,
so says the law’s conceit.
The government’s an arse!

Addictive drugs are banned, which makes the barons rich.
The baccy tax is high,
the government is rich.

Chorus:
Tobacco’s such a treat
and dope is danger grass,
so says the law’s conceit:
the minister’s an arse!
A uniform is forced so kids hate that, not school; as prohibition laws conceal the true misrule.

Chorus:
Tobacco’s such a treat
and dope is danger grass, so says the law. Repeat:
yes, parliament’s an arse!
The government’s an arse!
The minister’s an arse!
The Queen Of Santa Fe

My memories are slippery and sharp, and coloured by the heat of her, adventurous and sweet.

Three months ago, I met the Queen of Santa Fe, her hair as red and long as twenty seven years.

She caught my English words, her throne and duty may have been this city in the dust, but she’d never left her Isis home, a council youth, a river bank, a teacher with the petulance to force a lifetime long–haired girl to cut her pride, to mark the drought of ’76.

She heard my English words and spoke, exuberant, compleat of drink and desert glow, she spread her history.

She kept my English words, and dreamt her night in Oxfordshire, as snow caressed the foreign lands where she will ride forever.

I saw disease kill my mother slowly, eating her movement.

No matter how much the death expected, shock stains the grief.

It made me silly stupid:
I brewed a cup of coffee and put it in the fridge.

Those around can care resolve.
Even my high tail cat observed and fussied me her affection.

Here.
I know your pain.
Let me care.
old man Keats

i’m walking these empty lands i’m old slow and graceless the air’s bracing a lonely cold i’m enthralled by recollection we here such love so young

i lost limp onto war black red military battle the stench of dogma

i’m too slow they execute could–be spies dying surely waits for me if i’m to die violent i’ll sneer the killers i’ll be all they can’t i shelter ruins i lay my pack unpacked groundsheet peasent food water ‘hours of idleness’ the battle flows turbulent unpredictable waves conflict the blood wash nears ebbs nears those trained to die do quickly survivors dance the killing ballet turning luck burns their victory a squad and sergeant tumble me accidental glance aghast at my civil taunt one lad speaks a runner runs and returns a captain rides up like the emperor he used to be sad laughter the squad is guard the battle sprints the others swarm confrontation

but a man shouts ‘old man Keats’ shock stop and hardly believe both swarms curse and tension guard sod the lot of them when we were here wilderness lovers we were a better bang even though i’m dead i’m not allowed to die but soon i will run the dark road return to you

A Bicycle Criticises Concorde For Not Observing Butterflies

Within a fiction, set in Samurai Japan,
there are a hundred men, on a beach, rows, dead.

They were betrayed, not by their leader, who let an enemy ooze behind lines, not by their pointless simple honour; no, they were betrayed by their author.

“So what?” you might say, “they’re only characters in a cheap novel”, “if that”, you might add, “hardly worth their sentence.”

But had any one of them, dead to sharp that moment’s plot, lived beyond their author’s laziness; they could be: what?

Perhaps these non–born, having snatched creation for such a callous blink, deserved their self–assassination; they could have chosen a better book.

The film was, of course, successful.
chase chase

a real smile presented me a gleaming dish of crumble speckled with berry–red and moist something to very much like i take the first mouthful a rush of flavour fruit then a tooth is broke on stone emotion like fingers in boiling many men relish

chase chase

but i detes
