America

The “What–A–Good–Idea” Pilgrim Fathers brought no wagon,
brought no wheelwright.

One exasperated lady
invented a working truck,
the “Mary Cart”.

Now, in this time,
‘Lingua Franca’
meant what it said.

Affected fools
morphed their speech to French, sounding silent a word’s last consonant:

but not the end of Mary’s name for she was young unmarried; cracking shins for reputation.

So the words a Crown Inspector heard on riding the colony’s Mary cart were “er…this is a Mary car’.”
Years ago,
bed design was perfected.
Reasons were spun for wheels:
sending from carpenter to customer, obsessive room re-arrangers, rocking bouncy kids to sleep.
Early beds had standard wheels.

Unfortunately,
young couples,
as young couples do,
experienced runaway passion, forgetting to put the handbrake on.
Beds bounced about,
buckshotting walls, canoning furniture, rocketing lamps, smithereening china.

Makers shrunk the bed wheel size, making transportation hard.
Convoys of beds,
raced across the countryside,
became rare.

The difficulty was water.
In those days,
few rivers had bridges.
Goods with normal wheels
transversed fords.
Beds were now ferried,
increasing costs.
So those rare places
with very shallow fords and a smooth river floor counted.
Such fords were found across rock–landscape rivers,
and nowhere else,
except in West Anglia.
A merchant town grew up,
named for the merchants’ luck:
Bedford.
Cambridge

In ancient days
the town of Ugg was filled by what would now be rudely called Neanderthals and peasants, and occasional flounced academics.

But the rich boys and the clever boys resented the rough and common culture, They caused a language strike–out against the sounded names;
the hills of Gog Magog became the ‘Local Ridge’.

But ‘Local’ was too wuss.
A horizontal jogging entrepreneur, who gifted screaming services loud and hidden on the hills to gentlemen with cash, was Madame “Catherine Anna Maud Belgique”.
She was known, in spoken code when wives were nosy near,
by her “Camb” initials.

Up grew the town
around the flouncing schools, whose name became,
from those wildly–rumour hills,
Camb Ridge.
But when that times’
unhumoured censorship collapsed, those earthen lumps
reverted back ‘The Gog Magog’.
So now the town was only named for gifted screaming services.
An academic city
named after a horizontal professional?
A king with cash to budget sensitive to scandal?
Something must be done.
But luck had struck;
the river could be named again,
the town could claim
a story good for getting grants, pseudo–history’s “Cambridge”.
Catford

The world’s most evil moggy, so he liked to think, was black cat “Ginger”, his name and counter shade caused him bully curse at army kitty school.

His great delight, this small and fluffing cat: when dogs arrived to greet hello and sniff those places dogs must sniff; he’d swipe each black and feeling nose with slicing sharpest claws.

Even the best of dogs were stung, for that was Ginger’s way. But Brian was quite a special mutt, and had the nous to more than howl; he barked around, and quickly found that every local hound had felt those claws.

Now Ginger loved to sleep beneath his scratching tree by the catfish stream. So Brian got half the local dogs to creep around and half–moon surround the napping sharpest claws.
And on the count of “whine two three”
the dogs all barked the barking song: “wr wr wr wr wr wr wr”
but stopped halfway through verse two.
Ginger panicked up, and ran the only no–dog way, he rushed right through the water.

And now the devious plan enlightened, for on the other side were all the other dogs hiding silent at Brian’s behest, until the soaking cat had landed there.
And then they barked, how sharp they barked;
the panicked cat, he rushed right splashing back.

And this is what a travelling landlord heard:
“Wr wr wr wr” “mwah!’ splash splash “Wrf wrf wrf wrf” “mwah!’ splash splash, and saw the panicked echo cat rush forth and back across the stream; he’d found a drunken place to build his inn.

And to this day, we’ve heard of Brian’s barkers, the famous “Catford Dogs”.

Bertha Bright’s childhood love was Keith Lea.
Bertha, only child, was heiress to fortune, to breath–sharp–in lung–ice fortune.

Keith grew proud
and left the Pennines for ambition, so he’d return to Bertha all pride and rich desire.

Despite the decades
Bertha refused all doubt of him, spurning the assertive hands of vagabonds, awaiting Keith, her Odysseus.

But he did not return;
she died alone, unmarried.
This sad story so inspired the ladies of Doolally, they renamed their town for Bertha’s love.

That’s the official line.
Actually, Keith eloped a Swedish royal;
and not just any royal
but the Swedish king himself.

They hid in Malmo suburbs;
Keith, professional man, a duck inspector;
the king, living his transvestite dream, scatty wife.
The neighbours had grasping eyes:
for the king overacted his bimbo avatar forgetting to remove his eye–draw crown when doorstep kissing Keith goodbye.

The Swedish State found their missing king.
Keith was banished to the empire’s beyond,
to Siberia,
where he died of a broken promise.

Of course Bertha knew Keith was gay.
She also knew heiresses handed fortunes over to husbands.

Sister Hester’s girlie dream was not a swirling gown or glitter jewels, but the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.

Every day at school in rugby class or hobnail boot and stamping club she dreamt the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.

There would be two hundred and ninety–three bathrooms one for every cat she’d ever sat on in the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.

So massive and humongously huge the mouse holes will be dragon holes
in the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.

But Little Hester became Big Hester and her children grew up to be accountants she forgot the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.

And Big Hester became Granny Hester, telling them all of naughty naughty boys, she remembered the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.
And then a competition rose,
rename the town of “Rainie”:
she thought of the biggest and bestest house
there ever was.

“Hester’s House? No. Hester’s Mansion?
Mmmm. Just manche. Yes, yes! Manche Hester!”, named after the biggest and bestest house there never was.
Two grand economists uniting like fusing hydrogen, and exploded as quickly apart again. The younger, Milton Friedman, ran the world to Chile to invent half–built shopping–centres and military dictators. The older, John Meynard Keynes, kept to England to invent stagflation (remember?), wine gums, and birthed their child. Even today anyone is welcome to Milton Keynes.

Few people know donkey’s ears later these two great economists reconciled and named the baby Gordon Brown.
Norfolk

“Nowt as queer as folk”, the famous Yorkshire phrase recites.

Five hundred year it’s been since this was set to one specific place.

A location full of so strangest people the idiom rode all the land’s gossip.

“Nowt as … folk” it reduced,
“Now folk” the locals counter–spun.

And when the counties came along this flub was spoken ‘Norfolk’.

Sandy

A sect, a now forgotten name, known by populist satire
the “The No Naughty Nookie Nutters”, built a priory.

They chose a place to speak belief, to keep themselves entirely pure.

They made their beds in sand,
so if desire decided to arise,
the lust was broken scratched.

The town they built and bloated took the name of soil and county: Sandy Beds..
